TRACK DESCRIPTION

This track welcomes contributions on how markets and institutions can finance a credible, efficient, and socially inclusive energy transition, examining the links among corporate decisions, financial intermediation, public policy, and measurable environmental and social outcomes. This track encourages studies on transition finance and capital allocation, including green bonds, sustainability-linked instruments, blended finance, guarantees, and public development banks, as well as on how lenders price transition risk and how energy shocks, carbon pricing, and policy changes affect credit risk, collateral values, and financial stability. This track particularly welcomes research on the recognition, measurement, disclosure, and assurance of transition expenditures, stranded assets, and transition plans, and on how boards, ownership structures, and executive incentives shape transition strategy and accountability. Contributions on renewable energy, grids, storage, hydrogen, and critical minerals, on innovation and productivity, and on affordability, regional development, policy credibility, and energy security in a just transition are of specific interest. Theoretical, empirical, and interdisciplinary approaches are all in scope.
